"Oh yes I do, for example age factoring."
"That factor was just something programmed into the game early on."
"I went back, and I think it was in the first database that there were guys and girls, 4th ed DBCs, 4th ed EBAOs, everyone had levels they finished, so I made a giant table of 4th ed DBC x EBAO and 4th ed DBC x EBAO x EBAO and..."
"There were like 15 tables like that, working out the impact."

I am looking to get a snapshot of all the tables within a SQL Server database (SQL Server 2008) without having to use a wizard. I am aware of the sys.tables query to get a list of all tables within a database but I am unsure if that query will give me all tables within that database - or even within that server instance. Can anybody provide an efficient way to view all tables in a SQL Server 2008 database, and preferably a small snippet of SQL that I can use in my code? Much thanks! A: The following script should list every table (with every column) in every database in a SQL Server instance
