Physical properties and in vitro digestibility of laser-engineered, micropatterned cell immobilization matrices with adipose-derived stem cells. Adipose-derived stem cells are being widely investigated as an important source of adult mesenchymal stem cells for cartilage tissue engineering. The ability to direct cell attachment and proliferation is an important goal of tissue engineering. The present work aims to assess the biocompatibility of cell immobilization matrices with two-dimensional (2D) patterned cell immobilization and three-dimensional (3D) patterned cell immobilization. Neodecalized collagen (NOD) matrices, modified by either 2D patterned or 3D patterned collagen (Col) gel, were fabricated using a focused-ion-beam (FIB) system and then evaluated for their biocompatibility in vitro. The biocompatibility of NOD matrix was compared with unmodified NOD matrix and that of collagen (Col) gel. The morphological and mechanical properties, the in vitro cell release rate, and in vitro degradation of the cell immobilization matrices were characterized in vitro. The results demonstrate that the cell immobilization density of NOD matrix is higher than that of Col gel, with both matrices being porous and self-supporting. However, the deformation rate of the matrix in both NOD and Col matrices was significantly faster than that of the control group without cell immobilization. 6d1f23a050
